The association further decided to take up the question of more ample provision children suffering from tuberculosis With the new emphasis placed upon the danger of infection in childhood, as shown by recent studies on the subject, the directors of the association have come to feel that prevention must begin with the child. The association, there-fore, hopes to make more ample provision in its dispensary service for a children's clinic, and to secure the co-operation of the hospitals of the city caring for children in the interest of those children exposed to family infec-tion, where adequate means are not at hand to care for the patient at home. The association also took up the ques-tion of the proposed alley bill in relation to the high death rate in the alleys from tuberculosis. A warning note was sounded by Gen. Sternberg and others that in the abolition of the alley as a place of human habitation special pains must be taken to avoid over-crowding on the street. Several speakers, however, called attention to the fact that there are at the present time many houses for rent in Washingon at a comparatively low figure, and that under proper restric-tions as to over-crowding these houses can be made available for the housing of artisans and unskilled laborers of modest

A two-reel romance of the stage en-titled "The Relic," is the latest Bronco release.
Old and without funds, Malcomb Ross a Shakespearian actor, is obliged to ac-cept a minor role in a revival of "King Lear." During the first performance of Lear." During the first performance of the play a drop falls upon the star. The manager of the company is told by an actor playing the part of The Fool that Ross formerly played in the role of King Lear when he, The Fool, took part in the same production.

Ross is given his long awaited oppotunity to play to a metropolitan audience and his success is instantaneous. The papers next morning are filled with his praises. The manager looks him up at his lodgings with the reviews in hand to congratulate him. He finds Ross, however, very ill. From the landlady of the boarding house the manager learns that Ross has been with-out funds to meet his bills for several weeks past and that, too proud to accept alms, the aged actor had gone with out food for several days preceding the production of King Lear. Ross dies happy, however, with the favorable reviews in his arms and the

tributes of his fellow actors ringing in

In it is an old question that has been sked and answered many times in many different ways: "Does the end ever jus-tify the means?" Now the present play is not going to attempt a definite an-swer to that question, but it is going to throw some illumination upon it. This is the play spoken of some time ago through the press which Lois Weber, Phillips Smalley, Wallace Reid and Dorothy Davenport combined to make. What, with that splendid actor, Rupert Julian and the agreeable Billy Wolbert, the piece has an all-star cast.

It is a virile story of ultra-modern high-life, showing aspects of love, pas sion, vanity and fear as they are under the thin stratum of lackadaisical senti-ment and false tradition.
